

Mississippi's Medicaid Coverage Gap

Many working Mississippians are living without access to affordable health coverage. They can't get insurance through their jobs, can't afford private health insurance, and make "too much" to qualify for Mississippi Medicaid. They live in what is called the "Medicaid coverage gap."

Because Mississippi hasn't expanded Medicaid, 200,000 residents are left without access to affordable health insurance – and without the care they need.¹

40 states have expanded Medicaid. Mississippi has not – and Mississippi's families are paying the price.

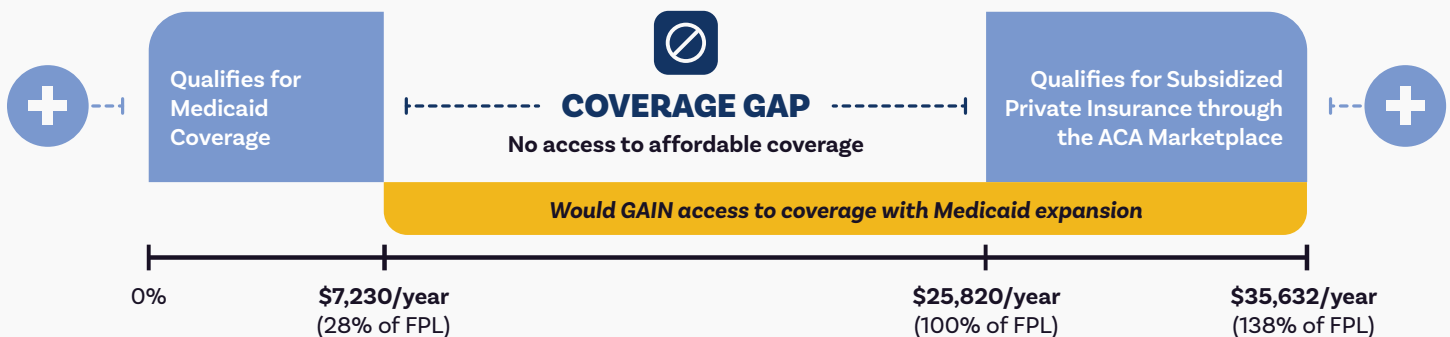

In Mississippi, a family of three making $7,230 a year makes "too much" to qualify for Medicaid.²

Mississippians over the age of 18 without children NEVER QUALIFY for Mississippi Medicaid.

Many Mississippians don't get health insurance through their jobs, even though these jobs are vital to our state's economy.

People who have affordable health insurance can:

Get regular check-ups and preventive screenings to stay healthy.

Get the medications they've been prescribed to manage their health.

Treat chronic conditions so they can stay healthy and remain in the workforce.

We cannot achieve our vision of keeping Mississippians healthy and working without closing the Medicaid coverage gap.

Where you live should not impact whether you can get healthcare.

The Medicaid coverage gap is contributing to our rural healthcare crisis. Our hospitals are shutting down at an alarming rate. Expanding Medicaid strengthens our rural hospitals and ensures they stay open – creating good paying jobs and providing critical care in our rural communities.

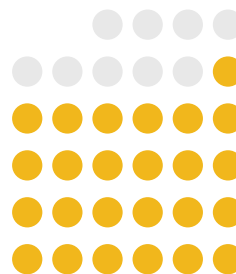

Medicaid expansion is good for Mississippi's state economy.

The federal government will cover 90% of the cost of expanding Medicaid. These federal funds would allow Mississippi to expand affordable health coverage to those who need it, build a healthier workforce, keep rural hospitals open, and grow our economy.¹

Nearly half of rural hospitals are at risk of closure in Mississippi. (34 out of 74)

25 of those are at risk of closing immediately, or within the next couple years.

200,000 working Mississippians are being left behind without access to affordable health coverage. It's time for Mississippi to expand Medicaid and close the gap.
